Current Research Program

Technology in the Public Interest: I have studied the impact of high technology on social change organizations and efforts for the past twenty years. My earlier studies helped established the field and some are still cited today. I have endeavored to be a thought leader in this part of the field. My research examines four interrelated areas: (1) technology and advocacy for social change, (2) the role of data and data science in public policy, (3) The changing nature of social policy in an information society, (4) Informatics in the public and nonprofit sectors.

Over the years, I have involved colleagues, students, former students, and community partners in my research. I have constantly crossed institutional, disciplinary and national boundaries in conducting my research and selecting research collaborators. I have successful mentored new scholars in this area, many who now have their own research programs.
